I have never had any pets like cats or dogs but the story meant a lot to me.

Though I haven't given much thought to death and life before, I felt that both life and death are so close to me, and I've realized another way of looking at death.

In the story I think Jess was really shocked and despaired when he heard about his cat's condition, which was too late for it to be cured. I was really surprised that Jess didn't want his cat to live even a little longer. Instead, he wanted to free it from the pain.

I was deeply affected by his decision.

I felt that sometimes courage to set someone free is more important than just having someone live with full of pain and the decision will be a way to show his beloved one respect and love, too.
